'Why We Sat-In'

Participants in last week's CIA sit-in and their sympathizers explained their motives Friday to some 400 people in a noon "speak-out" on the College Green.

Arnold Strasser, graduate student and sit-in leader said, "We are not asking for the administration to make a moral decision on the CIA; we are asking for a confrontation of ideas."

"We felt only the sit-in could dramatize what we really meant," he explained.

Mr. Strasser also warned that the demonstration is "hardly worth it" if the demonstrators lost sight of the ultimate goals. "Then we have truly lost," he said.

Scot Blue, assistant professor of psychology and a participant in the sit-in, recounted last Tuesday's events. He called the obstruction "relative, not absolute," and said that the demonstration had been, as had been intended, "of a non-violent and peaceful nature."
